My thinking is that while he is here, we should cooperate fully with him. Giving him doc to read is fine, if we can usefully give him a PC with some tools to try out, that's fine to. In fact, not doing this may seem a bit odd, given that Gary (for example) has been able to develop a sample aps on his machine.

We should set him up in a booth at the other end of the world from Bob Vallone.

I think we should request that he not remove (or copy) documents from the offices for the time being, and explain that this is not a personal criticism but reflects the early state and relative lack of definition of our relationship with MSFT at this time.

Do you think this will be taken in the right spirit? If not, we should consider a specific agreement about what will be done with our docs (like a log of who sees them that we get a copy of, that they be kept under lock and key, and that they not be duplicated?)
