we don't want people at borland and word perfect who are developing competitive os technologies (for instance, WP is doing OpenDoc for Windows) to have access to our confidential material.

Borland & WP are about to receive new NDAs that restrict their ability to disseminate information about Chicago within their own company (since they are working on Chicago-competitive things like OpenDoc). Until you hear from myself, Dave, Brad or Bob that these NDAs have been signed, these two companies are not to receive any further drops of Chicago (Teri, that goes for the early tools release too).

Thanks.

#1: we planned to deliver it, but Bradstr asked that DRG do it instead

#3: Yes. In fact the idea is to keep any OS competitor from seeing Chicago in an early release. When WP provided us with a prerelease to test under Win 3.1, we could not let anybody not involved in testing see that... and certainly could not show it to the Word team. We now have a special Borland languages NDA that lets us get prereleases of Borland C++ for testing, and we must restrict its use to the Chicago team. While Borland/WP might complain, we are just asking them to do for us what we have done for them!

Couple of questions:

- 1) Who is delivering this to Borland? DRG? Chicago group?
- 2) I assume the WP contract is going to change now that they have been bought by Novell?

- 3) I do not understand the legal verbage here? Are we trying to keep the people working on OpenDoc/AppWare from seeing Chicago until the EEP?

Or we trying to keep them from developing these technologies on top of/for

Chicago until the EEP?

We need to understand this stuff especially if you want us to deliver these.

Adam...

i made some changes using redlining. someone in the windows group will have to handle the interaction with the companies as i will be out of the office tomorrow through the end of next week.

thanx for the quick turnaround, maggie.
