

product Windows 4.0.

We would be adding quite a bit of sizzle. It adds a new level of functionality to the product and breaks new ground.

What do you think?

Please respond asap.

a dpml version of windows will only run standard mode. the dpml server takes care of the virtual memory management and multiple virtual machines.

we are willing to produce dpml-client versions of windows for oem's who license Windows and make corresponding commitments to windows. we will not be providing the dpml-client version as the retail product.

it would also be up to the oem to do all the testing and support.

actually, andyhi confirmed to them (according to tonya) that media sense wasn't in the beta. we should double check on this; I thought it was in, too.

This is just more crap. Media sense has always been in (at least since Jan) and is staying in. What are these guys up to anyway? Some mud slinging in the press?

we don't want to support outside developers, directly, either. we want you to do it. in fact, we've told developers not to answer calls from outside developers, but rather refer them to developer support. but there always inevitably be some cases where an outside developer calls some buddy developer at microsoft to get the straight scoop. that's probably what happened here, as adrian king is now at artisoft -- as you know, adrian was at microsoft for a number of years (??) and knows a number of developers very well. so sure, he had some guy at artisoft call some friend of his in development at microsoft. it's gonna happen; you'd do it yourself if you were him.
